E-Basics is a daylong educational session that helps dealers more successfully use the Internet to sell cars. Attendees learn indispensable tips and proven techniques and strategies from AutoTrader.com's dealer trainers and from each other. The program, unique to AutoTrader.com, includes information about understanding today's automotive consumer, Internet Best Practices and building an effective Internet sales department.

In the past year and a half, AutoTrader.com has reached more than 5,000 dealers in 115 cities nationwide with E-Basics. Across the country and at eight major national automotive conventions, free training has been given to customers and new contacts alike. AutoTrader.com continues to use feedback from these sessions to create even better training materials and programs.

"Dealers continuously ask us for more training and they walk away from our sessions with practical ideas from our dealer trainers and from fellow dealers," said Chip Perry, president and chief executive officer, AutoTrader.com. "Through E-Basics, we show our unparalleled commitment to our more than 40,000 dealer customers."

Last month, AutoTrader.com launched a Best Practices microsite, which echoes the teachings of its E-Basics program. Through streaming video modules, the site explains to how to use proven dealer best practices to increase sales by more effectively merchandising vehicles online. It also explains the benefits of using online classified listings to attract potential customers. The microsite is accessible at <http://bestpractices.autotrader.com/> , with upcoming E-Basics dates at <http://bestpractices.autotrader.com/ebasics/> .
