Advertising Essentials teaches dealers practical skills and tactics to effectively merchandise their cars on the Internet and to maximize the return on their Internet advertising investment. The modules cover writing good copy, taking good photos, the importance of pricing, and reviewing listings to improve results. The interactive site is training-focused, quizzing users to test and reinforce the important information being taught so that they improve their skills. All of the concepts discussed in the training can be applied to advertising on all third party Internet sites as well as dealer web sites.

"We continue to see a need in the marketplace for increased Internet marketing and sales skills and we are committed to providing dealers with compelling training on proven techniques to merchandise their cars and reach in-market car shoppers," said Chip Perry, president and chief executive officer, AutoTrader.com. "Advertising Essentials training will help dealers achieve a higher level of sales and profits from their Internet advertising, regardless of the sites they are using."

AutoTrader.com CEO Chip Perry and National Dealer Trainer Jack Simmons are featured and introduce the training modules, which are aimed at automotive and Internet sales managers and new and used car dealers. Users have the capability to download the training session to mp3 players so they can listen and learn on-the-go.
